Powerful Ministry Requires Powerful Technology

The Holy Spirit is the ultimate power behind any ministry. But in today's world, reaching believers and the unevangelized requires powerful technology.

But is technology creating new challenges for the Church?

Too often churches are cobbling together apps and media from a bunch of different providers—many of them secular. Not only do the creators of these tools not fully understand your mission, the tools themselves were never meant to work together. And that means pastors and church staff have tech that often works against them rather than for them.

COVID-19 Introduced New Ministry Challenges

As if pastors didn't have enough to contend with, research shows that post-COVID-19, churches will face new ministry challenges they must prepare to address today.

However

Churches need more than church management to grow ministry

To face down this challenge, churches need an integrated ministry platform (IMP). Because an IMP replaces expensive apps, with an affordable bundle, it frees up ministry dollars. Even better, each component of the platform works together to provide automations that free up your time in a way a traditional ChMS never could.

26% of churches say finding the right tech stack is the biggest challenge
